Run-off scrapped as West seeks power-sharing deal

Almost ten weeks of political paralysis in Afghanistan was brought to a close yesterday when a presidential election run-off was cancelled and President Karzai was declared the winner following the withdrawal of his only rival.

Western leaders rushed to endorse the Independent Election Commission's decision and congratulate Mr Karzai, desperate to end a crisis which has undermined their efforts to defeat the Taliban and build democracy in Afghanistan.

Dr Abdullah Abdullah, who pulled out of the race on Sunday in protest at Mr Karzai's failure to tackle electoral fraud, also appeared tacitly to accept the decision after coming under intense pressure from the international community.

But questions remained over the legality of the result which gives Mr Karzai another five-year term in office. The Afghan leader is expected to make a victory speech today and will be inaugurated before world dignitaries later this month.

But his reelection lacks credibility because he did not win the necessary outright majority in the first round on August 20, after which a UN-backed investigation disqualified a million of his votes because of fraud.

Western officials were also still trying to broker a power-sharing deal between Mr Karzai and Dr Abdullah to prevent a potentially dangerous split between the Tajik-dominated north and the predominantly Pashtun south.

"The point is Karzai's mandate is very, very, tenuous," Nick Horne, a former UN political officer in Afghanistan who worked on the elections, told The Times.

The IEC, whose top officials were appointed by Mr Karzai, said it made the decision because of the cost and risk of organising Saturday's run-off, and because a one-horse race would compromise the President's legitimacy.
